

Marie Lecluyse

Interior architect Marie Lecluyse transforms each commission into a personal story. According to her, a design starts with the singularity and preferences of the residents. Everyone is unique, so our homes are too. Apart from the evident balance between aesthetics and functionality, she therefore always explores the lifestyle and how it influences an interior, and vice versa. A person-oriented approach that tunes every detail to the residents is the only right one, Lecluyse argues. Her goal is fulfilled when a concept is not only stunning to look at, but also comfortable and well thought-out to spend your days in. With her informed dedication and sophisticated vision, the interior architect sets out to smoothly finish every project from conceptualisation to realisation. Project Balance is located at the Belgian coast and consisted of a total renovation. More than a spacious villa, it is a home base where the light incidence speaks with soft words. In the entire selection of materials of colours, the focus on visual beauty immediately comes to the fore. Yet this does not mean plain surfaces only, because more than once striking marble patterns break the neutrality to a desirable degree. The sightlines were of great value, seeing that these offered surprising possibilities and, in doing so, promoted the home also practically to a success category. At the same time, the surroundings of the coast contribute to the experience, which is mostly aimed at harmony and luxurious comfort. The interior architect has more than succeeded in that intent, as we are used to from her.

Design celebrates individuality, where every space becomes a reflection of those who inhabit it. Luxury is found in the harmony of beauty and functionality, where each detail is thoughtfully tailored to enhance daily life. A well-designed interior doesn't just impress with its aesthetics—it embraces the uniqueness of its residents, offering a refined and comfortable sanctuary that feels both personal and extraordinary. It is in this balance of elegance and purpose that true luxury and individuality come to life.
